READINGA Read the text and answer the questions. Write full sentences.*What is targeted advertising and is it a bad thing?

Most of us use the internet every day for a variety of different purposes: we shop, we read the news, we post on social media, we surf sites for information as well as many other online activities. We give a lot of personal information to the websites and social media platforms we sign up to. That information can end up in the hands of advertisers and political-campaign groups, and enable targeted advertising.

So, why do companies and campaigners use this kind of advertising? It's because they can focus their promotions on the people most likely to respond to them positively. For example, a cosmetics firm won't be very successful if it sells its brand to most men because very few are interested in cosmetics. But a lot of women are interested in these products. So, it's better that the business concentrates on targeting those who are likely to buy—in other words, women—rather than targeting people at random. In the same way, political campaigners and activists also want to target the people most likely to respond to their campaign issues.

One problem with this is that it's helping to create a society where people only see and read things that interest them, or relate to them and their own culture. Advertisers and campaigners might be happy with that, but perhaps we need to ask what effect this is having on our ability to judge different situations and ideas. Some people think that it is having a negative effect because if we don't question our own beliefs, we won't be open to new ideas, and this could be dangerous for our society as a whole.

Targeted advertising and campaigns are not going to disappear. The only way to become more aware of their negative effects is through education. If people are taught that they need to question what they see and read, to think about both sides of an argument, then they will be more prepared to decide what it is they want to buy, or which campaigns they agree with.

- 1 What can happen to the personal information users give when they sign up to social media?

- 2 According to the article, what are the advantages of targeted advertising for business?

- 3 Why does the writer think targeted advertising is a problem?

- 4 According to the writer, what do people say can happen if we don't question our beliefs?

- 5 How can the negative aspects of targeted advertising be dealt with?
